Brandon Mably has achieved an international reputation for his innovative use of color. Mably travels the world teaching his acclaimed "Color in Design" workshops for knitters, picking up inspiration everywhere he goes.

In Knitting Color, knitters of all skill levels will learn the keys to Mably's color technique. In the Color Workshop section of the book, Mably demonstrates how, using only a few basic stitches and a freshly trained eye, knitters can discover a whole new spectrum of possibility.

Knitting Color boasts 20 original patterns inspired by Mably's extensive travels. His designs draw from the most unexpected yet vibrant sources: a stack of bangle bracelets at an outdoor market in India; the rugged terrain of the Australian outback; the charm of a Guatemalan chapel; the bold, imposing mountains of Alaska; and the lively, clever accoutrements of a South African outdoor festival. All of these patterns display the effervescent wit and refusal to think inside the box that are signatures of Brandon Mably's style.

More than just a pattern book, Knitting Color is an introduction to a unique way of seeing, popularized by one of the most dynamic knitwear designers in the world today.

Introduction by Kaffe Fassett

Soon after Brandon joined my studio as manager in 1991, he became curious to learn the various crafts I used in my work. He learned patchwork, needlepoint, mosaic, and rag rug making, but knitting posed the biggest challenge to him.

Being dyslexic, Brandon struggled with the mechanics of his first few swatches, but his fertile imagination was brimming with ideas by the time he mastered the techniques. He has an innate sense of style—the sort of talent one is definitely born with. Trained in catering, with no art experience, he had after one day in my studio a sense of what worked in a design and what diluted its potential.

Brandon's feeling for color and its mysterious power was always there to be developed. Rarely have I been around someone whose judgment is so sure when it comes to sorting out colors. Not tempted to imitate my customary layered style, he has carved out his own graphic, yet playful approach to design. His pared-down compositions attract even beginner knitters and help them overcome any fear of pattern or color they might have.

Long ago I turned my knit workshops over to Brandon when I saw how encouraging he was as a teacher. Every person seems to leave Brandon's class empowered to work in color and create his or her own look.

I can't help feeling that Brandon will pass that same sense of confidence on to the knitters who work from this book. He has carefully worked out the colors for each design on these pages, but I will be curious to see what personal colors others come up with to better suit themselves.

This book is dedicated to all those friends who offered to carry my bags over the years and the trail of friends I've made throughout my journeys.

Preface

Over the years as a knitwear designer, I've had the fortune of traveling to different parts of the world giving "Color in Design" workshops. In this book, I share with you some of the snapshots from my travels that have inspired my designs. All the garments are fairly straightforward to knit, using basic stockinette stitch along with a simple color technique I use. Once you get this under your belt, let the color do the work. This book pays homage to all the places I've been; it's also a visual travel diary for those who offered to "carry my bags" in envy of these adventures over the years.

I started my career in knitwear design in the early '90s when I turned from catering to working with yarns and colors. This unusual career change came about through an accidental meeting at a bus stop near my apartment in London, with the man who put color knitting on the map—Kaffe Fassett. The moment I first walked into Kaffe's studio, I was enthralled by the environment. Shelves were stacked high with spools of colored yarns in different textures, Oriental pots sat on layers of Kilim carpets, and paintings were hung between bookshelves covering every available inch of wall space. It felt like walking into a cavern collaged with treasures from every corner of the world. This was my first brush with this kaleidoscopic world of color and design, and I knew right away that I wanted to be a part of it.

I observed the running of the studio while watching Kaffe execute commissions and create the books he is now famous for. Asking for my input on the designs he was creating, and liking the intuitive answers I gave, he encouraged me to try designing myself. As I grew as a designer, I slowly took over the running of the studio and began teaching his workshops myself.

These teaching opportunities have taken me to every corner of the world—from the frozen landscape of Iceland to the sun-baked outback of Australia, from Asia and Africa to North and South America. And everything in these varied and exotic lands has stimulated my designer's eye. In this book, I want to share with you some of the fantastic places that have so inspired me with their unique color happenings. Through photographs taken on my various journeys, you will see the inspirations that have fed my creativity over the years: the vegetable market of Vietnam with its fabric decorated stalls stacked high with brightly colored fruit; the rice fields in the countryside; strings of beads and bracelets hanging up in stalls in India; woven blankets from the textile weavers of Peru; and the clear rich blues and off-whites of the awesome glaciers of Alaska.

I hope you will find a wide selection of garments and accessories throughout the book to entice you, along with suggestions on colorways. Feel free to adjust the shaping of the garments—turning a jacket into a sweater, perhaps adding sleeves to a vest, or translating any design into a pillow. I am quite basic in my approach to knitting techniques, concentrating on using good old stockinette stitch and the intarsia and Fair Isle techniques described in detail in the back of the book.

I hope the journeys in this book interest you as much as they have interested me over the years.

Keep the colors flowing!

Color Workshop

All my work begins with color. I see it all around me—in the landscape, in buildings, in other artists' creations—and I'm always on the lookout for new, exciting combinations of shapes and textures that I can translate into a design.

Because I give workshops on color all over the world, many people assume I must have a theory, or even a magic formula for guaranteed success every time. If that's what you're hoping to find in the following pages, then I'm afraid you'll be sorely disappointed. The bad news is that, when it comes to color, there's no such thing as a magic formula! There are countless books on color theory that purport to hold all the answers, and learning about color theory certainly won't do you any harm—provided you're aware that it's only part of the story. But there's absolutely no substitute for hands-on experience.

One of the reasons color theory can let you down is that a simple color wheel, like the kind you see in art and design books, contains only twelve colors, whereas the human eye can discern hundreds, if not thousands, of different shades. Moreover, most of the color wheels you see reproduced in books are flat, mechanical pieces of artwork, often computer-generated—but when you're working with yarn (particularly natural fibers), you're dealing with texture and an infinite number of different shades. How can reading about color theory equip you to cope with that kind of subtlety?

Dealing with color in knitting—or any other medium, for that matter—is also a very personal process. Only you know what yarns you have at your disposal; only you can physically place one yarn next to another and assess how the colors work together; only you can assess your own emotional response to the color combinations you come up with. I don't believe anyone has the right to tell you that a particular combination of colors works, or doesn't work. If you like something, then it's right for you. (And even if you produce something that you don't like, someone else may fall head over heels in love with it!)

What I do with my students is get them to really look at the color they're using. It's much more challenging than simply reading about the theory, but ultimately, I believe, it's also far more empowering: It equips you to translate what you see around you into a design. In my workshops I take my students through a three-stage process, which I'd like to share with you. Go through the same process in your own home—and then go through it again and again, until it becomes instinctive. Like every skill, it's a matter of practice.

Stage 1: Analyzing color combinations

I don't necessarily expect you to come up with winning color combinations right from the outset, so start by analyzing someone else's creation.

Find a postcard of a favorite painting and try to work out why it appeals to you. Gather balls of yarn in shades similar to those in the painting, and see if they create the same effect. You'll realize that the proportion of colors has a lot to do with their dynamic. You might notice how a large area of earthy browns is activated by purple or moss green, how lemons and tangerines can be brightened by a hint of a sharp lime tone. Observe the level of intensity of the color scheme by determining which tones are the darkest and lightest. Is there a pure white or a true black? Notice how multi-shades that are close together vibrate, and how a bold color can bring a bland group of colors to life. Most great paintings will reveal some truth about color that will enhance your own work. (If you're wondering why I suggest working from a painting rather than from a photograph, it's because a photograph always looks flatter than a painting. The subtleties, the transitions from one shade to another, tend to be evened out and harder to see.)

Color Key

- ☐ light colors
- ☒ medium colors
- ☒ dark colors

Now knit a sample swatch and try to recreate your impression of the color scheme in your chosen painting. The key word here is impression. This exercise isn't about trying to recreate the painting; it's about interpreting it in your own way, making a note of combinations that appeal to you, and putting together combinations that you might not have thought of previously.

As a first step, turn your reference postcard upside down. It sounds weird, but this makes it easier to concentrate on the colors. This is a tried-and-true technique in drawing and painting, and there's absolutely no reason you shouldn't apply it when designing in other mediums, too. It's a way of encouraging the right hemisphere of your brain (the visual side). If you look at the painting right side up, you'll probably be tempted to actually name the different elements (flower, horse, building, or whatever), which involves the left (verbal) side of the brain and distracts you from really looking at the colors involved.

Use stockinette stitch throughout, and work with manageable lengths of yarn (by that, I mean pieces no more than about one arm's length), joining in new colors wherever they seem appropriate. Think about the relative proportions of the colors. If your reference postcard shows, for example, a deep pink flower against a dark green leafy background, are both areas the same size—or is there far more green than pink? If it shows a golden-leafed tree in fall against a vibrant blue sky, do the leaves dominate, with only small patches of sky showing in between, or is the sky the main feature? Remember, however, you're not trying to recreate the painting in yarn, like a needlepoint picture. You're looking at the way the artist has used color and learning from it.

When I'm designing a garment for publication, I have to restrict the number of colors that I use. In this exercise, however, I want you to experiment with as much color as you like, trying different possibilities and working outside your natural comfort zone. It's a little scary at first, as you have to make your own decisions rather than relying on a pattern, but you'll soon discover how rich and expressive multi-shades can be. And when you happen across a combination that really sings out to you—a combination that makes your heart leap and brings a smile to your face—it's a truly magical moment!

Continue until you've knitted about an inch or so, continually referring to your reference painting. Do not bind off the piece, as you'll continue working on it in the next stage of the process.

At this point, I often find that people are worried that their knitting doesn't look neat and tidy. They've got lots of loose ends and are using yarns of different weights, so the tension is all over the place. Forget about all that! That isn't the point of the exercise at all. You're not supposed to produce a perfect piece of knitting—and if you allow yourself to worry about it, you'll get so hung up on technique that you'll forget to analyze your color choices.

Above all, if you think you've made a "mistake" or don't like what you've done, do not, under any circumstances, pull it out and start over. If you find you've put together two colors that don't work, or the proportions of the colors are wrong, learn from it. You may even find that you can balance your "mistake" later in the piece by introducing the same color combination again.

By this stage, you'll have a piece of knitting that just looks like a randomly colored border to something else—but that's OK. You're not supposed to produce a finished piece. You may well be surprised at how mentally tiring it is—but you've started on the road to analyzing color combinations using your eyes, rather than your head.

Top: I start my color workshops with a huge pile of colored yarns in the middle of the floor, and as a demonstration, I usually make some appealing combinations and weed out discordant notes. I find myself putting a soft duck-egg blue with a group of pinks that starts to glow, or a burgundy red with a group of tobacco browns, or a soft lavender pink with grays or whites. These unexpected surprises are a real treat to discover.

Middle and bottom: These swatches of the Tumbling Blocks pattern show the different moods created by two different colorways.

Stage 2: Light, medium, and dark tones

The next stage in the process is to think about the tones, or values, of color. (“Tone” is simply a way of describing how light or dark a color is.) To do this, I give my students a knitting chart based on an old patchwork pattern known as Tumbling Blocks, which consists of three repeating diamond shapes—one light, one medium, and one dark. When the tonal values are assessed and placed correctly, the diamonds take on the appearance of interlocking boxes and the pattern looks three-dimensional.

Still referring to your reference postcard to keep track of the relative proportions of different colors in the piece, follow the chart, changing to a light-, medium-, or dark-toned yarn at the appropriate point. If your light tones are too dark, or your dark tones are too light, there won’t be enough of a distinction between them and the mid-tones for the pattern to look three-dimensional. You won’t always want the full range of light, medium, and dark tones in your work, but being able to recognize the relative values of colors is essential. With a strong, graphic pattern such as Tumbling Blocks, which has clearly defined blocks of color, it’s easy to see whether or not you’re assessing the tones correctly. Work at least one complete pattern of blocks, but do not bind off.

Tone is the aspect of working with color that most people find hardest to grasp. We tend to think of yellow, for example, as being a light color—but there are all kinds of yellows. A pale primrose yellow is light in tone, but a cadmium yellow or a deep canary yellow is more likely to be medium in tone. Greens can range from a very pale apple green to a viridian that’s so dark it looks almost black. Conversely, two colors that you think of as being very different—let’s say, green and pink—may actually be the same tone. Some people find that it helps to imagine the colors in front of them have been photocopied in black and white, so they become shades of gray.

To get used to assessing lots of different colors, try not to repeat the same colors in each diamond shape. If you use pale pinks and mauves in one light-toned diamond, for example, try knitting the next one using light blues or greens.

The other very important thing to bear in mind is that your perception of whether a color is light, medium, or dark in tone depends on its placement. To illustrate this, select a color that you think is medium in tone and place it first next to a very dark tone and then next to a very light tone. It will appear lighter when it’s next to the dark tone and darker when it’s next to the light one. Looking at a single color of yarn in isolation doesn’t tell you anything: you have to look at colors in combination with each other.

You’ll probably reach a point where you lose confidence in your abilities and feel you can no longer judge whether a color is light, medium, or dark. Almost everyone experiences this at some stage—but that’s only because you’re looking at colors in a new way and trying to assess how they relate to one another. I promise you, it will get easier.

Stage 3: Gradations of tone and color

What appears to be a solid block of color is rarely, if ever, completely solid. If someone asks you to describe a rose, for example, you might tell them that it’s red—but that’s only part of the story. A single bloom may contain shades ranging from deep crimson through scarlet to pinky-white, with almost imperceptible transitions from one shade to another. Solid blocks of color can look very dull and lifeless. These subtle distinctions and transitions are what bring your knitting to life and make it sparkle, like rays of sunlight dancing on water.

Now continue with the exercise from the previous stage, still following the Tumbling Blocks pattern—but this time, introduce other colors within each diamond shape, while still maintaining the light, medium, and dark values.

It’s very hard to see your knitting clearly when it’s bunched up on your lap, so every time you work a couple of rows in a new color, drape your knitting over the back of a chair or sofa so it hangs vertically. Stand across the room from it, and really look hard to see if your color choices are working. Better still, buy (or make) a corkboard to hang on the wall and pin your knitting to it so you can view it from a distance. You’ll be amazed at how different it looks. Remember that a knitted design will always be seen from farther away than when it is in your lap. It's like the difference between standing so close to an oil painting in a gallery that you can see the individual brushstrokes, and then stepping back to view it as a whole.

Continue until you've completed at least the second repeat of the Tumbling Blocks pattern, then stand back and assess your progress. This is the point in my workshops at which all the swatches people have struggled to create are put on a board, creating a large, joyous tapestry of color. Knitters are often amazed that their humble efforts add up to such a glowing arrangement.

From inspiration to design

These are difficult concepts to grasp, and the only way to come to grips with them is to practice, practice, and then practice some more. Persevere and you will start to look at things differently. Instead of seeing a blue sea, you'll notice myriad shades of azure, turquoise, and aquamarine. Instead of seeing a field of green grass, you'll be able to pick out numerous greens, yellows, and browns.

I've trained myself to look at things in this way, and now I do it instinctively. When I'm inspired to translate something into a knitwear design, I analyze the colors in the way I've described in my three-stage process: first, looking at the color combinations and the relative proportions of each color in the overall scheme; second, assessing the tonal range required; and third, putting in those subtle transitions from one shade to the next, to bring the color schemes to life.

The aim of this book is to share with you some of the things that inspire me as a designer. If you understand some of the design decisions I make, you will, I hope, be able to embark on a similar creative process for yourself. It's a very personal voyage of discovery. Every one of us is different; every one of us draws on his or her own interests and experiences. That's what makes the process of designing and creating things so infinitely fascinating.

Australia

I can remember digging deep holes in the sand as a boy at the Welsh seaside. As the holes got deeper, I thought I would soon reach Australia—the other side of the world from the UK, with its sun-kissed beaches, friendly people, and fascinating Aboriginal history.

When I finally did get there, years later, I had no idea how large the country really was. Flying across it to Sydney, I was amazed at the vastness below me. Endless desert plains were laid out, as flat as a massive stingray, interrupted only by the eruption of Uluru (Ayers Rock), an extraordinary copper pink mound settled into the scorched terra cotta earth. (This region is known as the Red Centre, part of the outback.) This was such a dramatic contrast from the baked desertscape we'd been passing over for hours.

Stepping out of my suburban motel room on the first morning of my trip, I saw a flock of shrieking, bright lime-green parrots dart across the early morning turquoise-blue sky. It all seemed so exotic, and a far cry from the blackbirds back in the UK. Flowers bloomed around well-maintained green lawns. Places in and near Sydney seemed strangely familiar, with English names like King's Cross, Euston, and Paddington, and neat terraced houses lining the streets. Overhanging verandas were decorated with ornate iron balustrades, mostly maintained with a smart coat of black gloss paint. Sydney's famous opera house resembled wind-filled sails, reflecting the country's love for the water. Around the famous Bondi Beach (where all the houses seemed to have views of this surfers' paradise), a string of beaches lined the coast under the carved-out cliff edges. These cliff walls were like folds of fabric, in shades of dusty pinks and soft putty-browns with cool gray tones—reminding me of Italian ice cream, in contrast to the rich reds of the desert soil. Keeping these shades in mind, I recreated them in an abstract vertical stripe, capturing the subtle tones of the cliffs and incorporating a shade of red from the color of the surrounding earth.

There are many color combinations you could apply to this pattern yourself – taking it into reds and purples with a shot of green, or replacing the red by going for a turquoise-blue. Another knit inspired by the colors from the outback is the Uluru Jacket, working with the lively greens of the foliage, soft orange of the earth, and the magenta shadows of the cactus flowers. This loose jacket is roomy and knitted in wools and cottons, making it quite cool, too!

Australia holds so many levels of inspiration. I took a hot air balloon ride near the Red Centre early one morning. Amazingly, the plant life on the desert floor resembles the Aboriginal paintings, soft dots of pale grasses on the deep desert floor. Probably the most powerful inspiration in Australia is the color that exists in the coral beds of the Great Barrier Reef – but that's a whole other story.

I visited Adelaide, Perth, Melbourne, Brisbane, Cairns, and Sydney, but Adelaide wins my vote for having the most charm and character. This old town is made up of small, handsome bungalows, with corrugated roofs and wrought-iron porches resembling oversized lacework. I was told at a museum that the first Irish settlers in Australia translated the family lace into braces of iron that became symbols of their identity. I only wish there was more individual detail of this kind used in today's architecture.

Most of Australia's population settled near the coastline. I did meet one gem of a lady attending our workshop who had traveled twenty-four hours by bus from a small farming town in the outback called Wagga Wagga. This is a very impoverished area where residents made blankets out of the old tailor's sample tweed books. These striking designs in men's suiting colors became known as "Wagga Waggas." I found one on display at the Powerhouse Museum in Sydney, and it inspired my first patchwork, which was featured in Rowan's Patchwork & Quilting Book. Patchwork is a new medium of expression for my color ideas.

Great Britain

England has a reputation for gray, rainy days, but when I think about the British Isles, what strikes me are the incredibly lush, ever-changing fields and farms of the countryside.

The land is laced by a cobweb of narrow lanes banked by undulating hedgerows. The weathered stone walls, having stood the test of time, weave their way across verdant hillsides in the Cotswolds, Scotland, Yorkshire, Wales, and Ireland; their tonal palette and texture are among the defining elements of the British Isles.

AKaffe was asked in a recent lecture, "If you could only work with one color, what would it be?" His reply – "shades of gray" – amazed the audience, as he is so well-known for his flamboyant palette.

There is something very satisfying, however, about working tone on tone. One advantage of Britain's gray weather is that it reveals a subtler palette, which would be washed out by glaring sunlight.

From left to right: Warm ochre tones in these cliffs offset the stoney grays; winter landscape of the English countryside; distressed texture on an English garden wall.

For Rowan's magazine collection, I have knitted several versions of a design called "Old Tiles"; here, I played with the same idea but used well over 100 different neutral shades in bouclé, silk, mohair, and wool for this highly detailed pillow design. There is something very satisfying in working with unlimited colors. I love using these multi-tones of gray, steely blue, warm pink, and brown. My only rule of thumb is to eliminate contrast and allow the tones to merge and smolder together, separated by charcoal-gray grouting. The piece is quite fine, done on a US 3 (3.25mm) needle, using mostly 4-ply or fingering-weight yarn.

On a playful note (and letting my cheeky side come out), I had to design something as an homage to our splendid British Royal Family, who keeps us all intrigued. I've also included a jacket with a dramatic stormy winter mood to it, reminding me of late afternoon and winter nights.

Guatemala

When the international charity Oxfam invited Kaffe and me to Guatemala to work with local craftspeople in creating some exciting new designs, we jumped at the chance.

I was overwhelmed by what I saw in Guatemala. It is the most colorful country I've ever come across, bar none. Color just seeps out of the ground. The clothes are inventive and fanciful. Both the men and women casually wear charming birds and flowers embroidered on and woven into their lavishly patterned clothing. The streets are filled with women wearing vibrantly colorful blouses that set off their black hair and tanned complexion. Occasionally you see a woman on her way to the market with a boldly striped blanket tied around her shoulder, the head of a child or the brilliant plume of a rooster peeking out. The buildings, too, show this love of color: dusty pinks, soft turquoises, pale yellows, deep ochers, and golds don their walls.

We stayed in a beautiful small town called Lake Atitlán where makeshift stalls line the winding road to the lake edge. Boldly painted wooden fishing boats ferry passengers across the lake to a village at the foot of an impressive volcano. Besides the charm of the bustling food market, the most endearing quality is the embroidery on the knee-length trousers worn by the men of this village. The trousers are made of a pale blue striped fabric, whose surface dances with bright little embroidered birds. They wear them with a striped sash at the waist, a gleaming white shirt, and an oversized straw hat with a black band that matches their moustaches—a dandy uniform, indeed.

Fortunately, I was able to purchase a pair of these whimsical trousers. Each embroidered bird is very colorful—just the inspiration for a children's knit design.

Moving on from Lake Atitlán, our next port of call was Chichicastenango. (The name makes me smile, sounding as it does like rattling maracas—chi-chi-castas!) This region is famous for its use of rose motifs woven into the huipils (elaborate poncho-style garments) worn by the women. The best examples of these textiles are found at the weekly market in the town's central square, below the steps of the cathedral. A maze of narrow alleyways, roofed over with plastic sheeting in shades of blue, is home to stalls proudly selling fresh vegetables and fruits to the locals, and textiles to the busloads of tourists.

The frenzy of this bustling market stands in stark contrast to the imposing dark cathedral entrance where worshippers work their way up the steps between the shoeshine boys and the vagabonds. They carry calla lilies while chanting prayers. I felt transported to a biblical scene in a medieval painting. Inside the vast church, the life-size religious figures are lovingly draped in Hermès scarves and other patterned fabrics.

I hope that you will be inspired to try knitting my interpretation of these sumptuous, overblown blossoms. If the background is a little strong for you, try a deep turquoise-blue. (Even a charcoal-gray would be handsome.) I leave it up to you to play with the idea.

Clockwise from bottom left: A beautifully subtle doorway; hand-embroidered jeans in luminous colors; two shots of a façade of a village church.

India

Of all my travels, what is the most inspiring place? It is difficult to say, as each place offers such an individual flavor. But of the many countries I have visited worldwide, my mind's eye always turns back to India.

Why India? I suppose it is because of the simplicity of life there, the way that poor people use extravagant amounts of color in both their dress and on their buildings, as if to lift their spirits and make them feel good—as colors do. They use color fearlessly in everyday life, from clothing to simple displays of fruit in the market to their famous handcrafts and textiles.

With every blink of my eyes I got a thrill in this amazing country, from vibrant saris stacked on the market stalls, to goat herders striding country roads with carefully balanced bundles of sticks on their heads. Pastel-colored buildings sport life-sized painted tigers and elephants. Opulently carved Hindu temples are decorated in vivid hues. (Some of these impressions of India's riotous use of color are captured for you to enjoy in a video called "Kaffe's Colour Quest." The video also includes a trip to Vietnam and a tour of the Kaffe Fassett Studio in London.)

I was struck by the intense color of India on my first trip there, when I was invited to assist on a project through the international charity Oxfam. Our mission was to help weavers produce work that would find a market in the West. Our main stop in Southern India was miles from the nearest town, a place that did not seem to exist on a map.

The villages consisted of a cluster of huts made from sticks—some of which had begun to sprout new growth. Layered banana leaves made up the roofs.

The women, who seemed to do all the hard labor, walked around in elegantly colored saris that starkly contrasted with the barren landscape. The men wore sarong-type garments appropriate for the intense heat.

As a treat for the children of the village, I filled our Jeep with an assortment of colored balloons. This caused a frenzy of excitement as we drove back into the village. I felt like the Pied Piper. The hours of ecstatic joy caused by this simple treat spoke volumes.

I stopped in one area to visit the weekly market where sellers gather from all over. Patchwork quilts made of shimmering fabrics were strung on clotheslines along with hand-painted bed sheets. Handmade sequined shoes and silver jewelry were everywhere—the assortment was overwhelming. A display of shimmering Lurex tops called out to me, its layout of squares in hot colors winking at me in the sunlight.

I combined the Rowan Summer Tweed yarns with Rowan Lurex Shimmer to capture the color palette for my Squares Jacket. Then I used the same color mood to create a felted bag. I also couldn't resist throwing in the striped knitted stole I'd done for Vogue Knitting in the past, as it is such a celebration piece and a real homage to the inspiration India has fed me through my visits. This piece saw me through years of workshops—I used the yarn scraps left over from a class. The piece is approximately 180 stitches wide on a US 3 (3.25mm) needle and approximately 7 feet long. The effort of working this on such a fine needle adds to the elegant drape.

Italy

I have had the good fortune of visiting Venice twice, and each time I've had the strong feeling that I was stumbling onto a period film set or into a classical painting.

All the buildings seem to have their own charm and character, their harmonious colorings unifying the city. It is a place where contemporary architecture, neon lights, and brash colors do not exist. I can still remember my sigh of delight as I entered this magical city, brimming with mystery and character. I can see the narrow walkways between canals; the terra-cotta and stone buildings five stories high, with their long, wooden shutters; the walls painted soft earthy tones, from deep ochre to faded pink; the ancient weathered patinas. Ladies in aprons lower baskets from the top-floor windows to hoist up their groceries. Laundry lines strung high across the narrow alleyways billow like huge flags. Grand buildings boast large wooden doorways with heavily carved frames and steps leading to the waterways, lending another edge of mystery and intrigue.

The city is split by the twisting Grand Canal, fringed by red-and-white-striped poles that seem to have become a symbol of the city. The waterways are bustling with sleek black gondolas, wooden barges, and vaporettos carrying varied wares, from heavy machinery to crates of vegetables and bottles of wine. Water taxis take the place of cars as they pass under splendid humpbacked bridges and wind their way through enchanting canals. Somehow, all of these intertwining waterways seem to lead to the heart of Venice: St. Mark's Square. St. Mark's is a grand piazza fringed with columned alleyways and cafés that spill out onto the cobblestones. On one side is the Doge's Palace, a stunning marble building supported by a colonnade of arches and columns. Next to it, at the end of the square, sits the famous St. Mark's Basilica, its opulent crescent-shaped entrance encrusted in mosaics in rich royal blues, reds, and gold. The floors in the cathedral's vast interior are decorated with geometric patterns made of marble, and towering columns lead up to gold mosaic ceilings. Kaffe, with whom I visited this magnificent structure, remarked, "How people concentrate on praying in such a visual building, I don't know!" While my first trip to Venice was purely a vacation, my second trip was to fulfill a dream of Kaffe's: to find a delicate Venetian chandelier covered in glass flowers for a room he had painted. The design was his version of Chinese wallpaper, painted in soft greens with voluptuous peonies. After hunting the antique shops in London and Paris for the right chandelier, we decided to come to Venice. The Missoni family lent us their rooftop vacation apartment overlooking the city, giving us a wonderful base. We headed out to the island of Murano, the center of Venetian glassmaking. This intimate island is a maze of back streets leading off the main canal, each street lined with showrooms housing floor after floor of shimmering light fixtures. (I, for one, would hate to do the dusting in these places!) Despite all of this variety, however, Kaffe never found the chandelier he had in mind. We finally came across a workshop where he worked with a glassblower to design a classical Venetian chandelier to his own specifications. It works perfectly in his room, and he now wants to design more of them.

My own design inspiration comes from the brickwork on the Doge's Palace, whose elegant design cried out to me as a natural Fair Isle pattern. In my St. Mark's Jacket, I tried to recreate this pattern using the soft chalky pastels of the stone throughout the city. If the palette is a little pale for your taste, try a rich periwinkle-blue for the main body color, a taupe for the lattice, and maybe a darker blue or chocolate-brown for the alcove. I get such a thrill seeing what others come up with, especially if they work in colors they are comfortable with. When in doubt, knit a swatch to see how your color choices work together before starting the garment.

My first sight of Peru was the capital city, Lima, a mixture of old and contemporary buildings crammed together. I had not expected to find lawns with L.A.-style properties overtaking the charming old city.

We unexpectedly stumbled across festivities taking place in the city's main square—Easter celebrations were in full swing. A dramatic religious procession was marching slowly, led by a noisy band of trumpeters and drummers. Young men dressed in pristine white shirts with wide canary-yellow sashes were hauling statues of Christ and the Virgin Mary, banked by towering displays of sunflowers and lilies, through the huge doors of the church. A gaggle of elderly women, draped in black lace from head to toe, carried candles to the imposing entrance of the church.

We found ourselves walking the cobbled streets and soaking in the street life until it felt like the soles of our feet were burning. The open-air markets were alive with fruit and vegetable stalls proudly set up with blankets in an array of vibrant colors. Occasionally, I passed by a woman dressed in the traditional woven huipil. These garments differed from those I saw in Guatemala; Peruvian huipils have more saturation of one color with added detail. This type of clothing became more common as we headed out of the city into the smaller towns and countryside. We learned that the details incorporated into the designs identified which town the wearers came from.

Clockwise from top: Flooded valley of paddy fields reflecting the blue sky; woman carrying a rooster to market; traditional, brightly colored woven blanket holding produce at a village market.

Heading out of Lima is like passing through a garden gate. Since the rainy season had just passed, the hillsides and fields were alive with every possible shade of green. Even the new seedlings in the farm fields made the rich brown earth look like a luminous shot cotton. Deeper in the countryside, young girls appeared from nowhere, dressed in woven garments in shades of hot red. With their black hair they looked adorable, like bundles of freshly picked poppies.

South America is known for its fine hand-knitting. One of the working relationships of which we are most proud is with a knitwear company called Peruvian Connection. They produce a handsome range of pima cotton and hand-knitted alpaca garments that they sell through their mail-order catalog. Kaffe has contributed many garments to this company, so visiting the knitters in Peru was a real treat. Since Kaffe uses dozens of colors in each garment, it takes the knitters there a week just to weave in the ends.

Flying into Cuzco, high in the mountains, takes your breath away because of the extreme altitude. From Cuzco we took a small train to the extraordinary ruins of the Inca city of Machu Picchu, which is perched on the narrow camel's back of a precipice. It is staggering how this magical place came about. Each massive steely gray unit of stone is perfectly cut and placed like a massive jigsaw puzzle. One wonders how this was done when modern tools were not available.

Choosing between the high contrast this country presents, from the dramatic landscapes to the rich colors of its textiles, I have taken as my inspiration this deep, earthy palette. This is an easy color scheme to wear, especially for men who prefer a more tame wardrobe. The pattern also knits up beautifully as a pillow or throw, if you want an easier project.

Clockwise from bottom left: Gorgeously bright parrots stand out against tiled roofs; a scene from the market; stunning stone architecture of Macchu Picchu; exotic fruit stacked high on brightly colored tablecloths.

South Africa

From the moment I set foot on South African soil, my trip was memorable. We were greeted by the wife of the chief of the Ndebele tribe, who was draped in a bold striped blanket of maroon, yellow, and cobalt.

Her round, shaved head was framed in a crown of white beads decorated with gold coins. Her neck was braced with a stack of brass bands, as if supporting her chin. I asked if she ever removed these bands. "No, these are my wedding bands," she replied. Around her waist were pale-blue and dusty pink beads, and fat bangles of the same style covered her ankles over rings of gold that went up to her knees. Her dainty white tennis shoes were her only concession to Western dress.

We drove northwest of the city across a barren landscape to visit her village. We had been on the road for over two hours when an advance party of blanket-clad, bright-bereted ladies suddenly appeared, dancing up the road while singing and blowing whistles to announce our arrival at the chief's house. His home was a humble bungalow, but it was decorated in the most brave graphic patterns of black lines with red and yellow set on white backgrounds. Every inch was painted immaculately as if done yesterday—including the yard wall. This was the same color palette depicted in their beadwork, which they were proud to show us. We were offered a ceremonial lunch of their favorite food, brought in especially for their honored guests: stone cold Kentucky Fried Chicken and fries.

A week later at a famous Crossroads township in Cape Town, we found rows of patchwork shacks constructed from sheets of weathered plywood, plastic, and corrugated metal. We were there to host workshops with people from the townships, to encourage their craft skills. At the center of the shacks, we found a workshop that hand-printed T-shirts and tablecloths. The crowd in the studio was a bit withdrawn, so out of the blue I asked if anyone could sing. There was a shy silence, followed by some whispers. Then the roof blew off.

They sang with gusto and danced around the room. After a few songs, they settled down and worked in total harmony. Inspired by this event, I now ask people to sing in my workshops in other countries.

The people of South Africa have a flawless and original sense of placement that is evident in the work that pours out of the continent. In Durban, there is an art center called the BAT Centre, every inch decorated in mosaic, collage, and murals. The shop specializes in selling the art of local craftspeople who live close to the poverty line in the township, encouraging them to continue to create their work. They sell items like baskets made from colorful telephone wires, hooked rugs, ceramics, beadwork, and miniature painted clay masks.

We attended the famous arts festival in the small picturesque mountain town called Grahamstown, between Johannesburg and Cape Town. During the festival week, street performers, music, and art seemed to ooze out from every corner. A painted bus stop grabbed my attention. Decorated in jolly clown faces on a rich royal blue background, it made me think of the mood colors of a Kandinsky canvas. But it was a garbage can, painted by children from a local school in canary-yellow with random colorful handprints, that prompted me to knit three pillows using a similar motif. I toned down the colors and placed the handprint on a wide-striped background. I also designed a throw inspired by a piece of African beadwork. Both designs first appeared in the UK's Knitting magazine.

United States

My first opportunity to visit the United States came when I was offered a seasonal job working at a summer camp in Pennsylvania at age 18. Arriving in New York City for an overnight stay, I found it hard to contain my excitement.

I had never experienced anything on the scale of those skyscrapers, and I remember having to strain my neck just to see the sky. The next day, my Greyhound bus left the city behind and rolled through manicured farmland leading into the Pocono Mountains. The bus dropped me off in the historic small town of Honesdale, Pennsylvania, where I was to live and work for the next six months.

I worked that first summer as a kitchen hand, and I returned the next year to take over the cook's job, catering for 300 at a sitting. I spent the money I earned experiencing firsthand what I had only seen on TV. I took a bus from New York to San Francisco, then down to San Diego and back. Traveling coast to coast on a non-stop, three-day journey filled me with wonder at the width and diversity of the country. I saw lush, open prairies; small towns where time seemed to stand still; built-up cities such as Chicago, with its gleaming, mirrored skyscrapers; barren mountainsides; and sweeping, scorched deserts leading to the lush greenery of western California.

Over the years, I have returned to the United States many times to give my "Color in Design" workshops. On all my visits—first as a wide-eyed young man and later as a seasoned traveler—I have had a wealth of experiences exploring new places. Highlights that come to mind are the charming towns in the Berkshires, the blazing colors of New Hampshire in the fall, and the leafy suburbs and grand houses of Little Rock, Arkansas. I have felt the exhilarating vibes of New York

Above: Fall colors on display throughout the United States.

City, Los Angeles, San Francisco, and Seattle. Washington, D.C., impressed me to no end with its grand, detailed structures. And I loved the mood of Philadelphia, with its intriguing architecture as well as more than 2,000 community murals lending color and light to otherwise monochrome buildings. Through my workshops, I have had the deep pleasure of stepping beyond the world of the tourist to experience and touch other people's worlds.

When it came time to choose the garments for this collection, I wracked my brain for an image that, for me, would represent the whole country. A design world that I deeply respond to is that of the Navajo Indians in the Southwest—after all, the American Indians are the original Americans. Remembering that my first knit design for Rowan Yarns was inspired by an American Indian basket motif called “Great Plains,” I looked at more Navajo basketwork, beading, and woven textiles. All of them incorporated bold geometrics.

I hope you like both of the designs I've decided to include. The Fire Maze Jacket employs many close shades of deep, hot red to give it texture. I have combined these shades with a geometric white outline in this simple jacket shape. The other design, the Harvest Vest, features shapes resembling arrowheads. I originally designed this garment for the UK-based magazine Knitting, using a different color scheme. Here, I chose Rowan's Summer Tweed yarn range, which lends itself to this handsome, earthier palette. The vest is ideal for wearing with jeans or under a jacket.

Vogue Knitting had invited me to join them on a cruise to Alaska to teach knitting workshops. Discovering firsthand this land of frozen landscapes, ice-covered mountainsides, and summers without night was very intriguing.

Leaving the skyscrapers of Vancouver, Canada, I boarded the pristine Sea Princess cruise liner with its tiny black portholes studding the ship's side like a neat row of buttons on a tuxedo shirt. Colorful crates of fruits and vegetables were hauled aboard by cranes as we readied for the journey ahead of us.

Leaving port, the ship glided through the steely blue-gray waters. Each morning I pulled back my cabin curtains to reveal towering, deep-blue, craggy mountains falling to sea level where the small towns we visited — Ketchikan, Skagway, Juneau, and others — were tucked away. Tiny water planes flew in and out of the ports like mosquitoes. From the ship's balcony I admired, with great curiosity, the life of these towns and their people. I can remember like yesterday taking a helicopter flight over a glacier. I was staggered by the scale of the vast ice floe filling the open valley high up in the mountains. It felt surreal, as if we were on the moon. The ice resembled a mass of wallpaper paste, reflecting shades of pale cream, pink, and light gray, with luminous turquoise-blue crevices.

I have returned several times to this curious land — once in the heart of winter to see how much snow Alaska really has, and how I'd cope with it (I loved it!). I was brave enough to take a snow bath to celebrate. I stayed in a wooden lodge on the edge of frozen Finger Lake, an hour's plane ride from Anchorage. This is one of the stopping points for the world-famous Iditarod dog race.

The only lifeline to this lodge was a tiny snow plane that acted as the passenger transport, garbage truck, and food carrier. When we flew over the snow-packed landscape, the only definition on the ground below was the primitive pencil sketch of the frozen river between the bare, wispy trees. Occasionally, we would see moose plodding through the snow. (My diary of this adventure can be read at my Web site, www.brandonmably.com.)

The landscape was dramatically beautiful, with constantly changing and moving weather fronts. The blinding sun glared off the snow and the wide-open frozen lake was like an enormous ice-skating rink. This expanse reached toward the walls of the distant mountains, pink and yellow pastels in the early morning, powder-blue and cold gray in the evening light. This was no white wonderland; the snow reflected all the colors of the sky. Combining the palette from the wilderness with the pattern of the rippling waves on the water, I came up with this design for a fresh two-color-per-row garment using the gorgeous Rowan Summer Tweed range. If you're not comfortable in light colors, try replacing the cream background with a warm brown—it should be rather handsome.

A friend of mine invited a group of us to visit Vietnam, the land of her childhood. A few years earlier, the country had re-opened to the Western world. We were enticed by the offer and by the exquisite silk and cotton textiles she had brought back from a recent trip, along with garden ceramic pots dripping in rich glazes of deep aqua-blues, greens, and old gold.

Arriving in Vietnam from my quiet North London neighborhood was quite a culture shock. Saigon was our first port of call. The city was swarming in the humid heat with people on foot weaving their way through the thundering road traffic. We passed enchanting old villas, reminders of the country's French Colonial past. Their tall shuttered windows and wide sweeping staircases were protected by high walls. At the other extreme were the makeshift homes with roofs of rusty corrugated iron or plastic sheeting. The street restaurants were simple: a little table, plastic stools, and a hot plate. They seemed constantly busy.

The roads were a river of rushing bikes, small cars belching exhaust, and honking horns. Crossing the road was always an alarming prospect, as the flow of cars never stopped. I observed an old lady who walked calmly into the traffic—which then passed around her like a rock in a river. It was a real test of one's nerves to follow her, but there was no other way to cross. An elegant note amid this chaos was the schoolgirls cycling along in sleek white uniforms and gloves, straight-backed, immaculate, and unfazed, like swans gliding through the traffic.

The marketplaces were organized intriguingly by profession: plumbers, mechanics, wood workers, etc. On one street we found plastic buckets and trays containing tools, nuts, and bolts neatly laid out; around the corner stalls sold plastic flowers, bamboo ladders, and stone carvings. When rain fell, the streets were transformed into a ballet of floating flowers. Everyone on bicycles donned pastel, plastic ponchos, gliding along like large petunias in their conical straw hats. When the sun came out, one could see how practical these hats were, providing protection in all weather. The fresh-produce market stalls were alive with inspiration—richly colored wild flowers in wire baskets, green vegetables piled high, and pyramids of pristine exotic fruit balanced on tables covered with floral plastic cloths.

Towering rock structures protruded from the deep jade-green waters on Halong Bay. Weathered gray, tan, and black clumps of foliage still managed to cling to these formidable places. Small fishing boats would sidle up beside us on the quay to sell their fresh catch. A small piece of weaving I found in the market made me think of these imposing island structures. I was inspired to translate the idea into the pillows presented in this chapter. One colorway is knitted with a tweedy green background; the other in tweedy rust from the Rowan

Scottish yarn range. It is fascinating to see how a different background changes the look.

In Vietnam, every inch of available land is farmed. Rice fields are dug into the steepest hillsides, forming a pattern resembling empty bookshelves. I've translated this idea into a neat vest using 4-ply yarn, a design I'm rather pleased with.

Technical Instructions

Many of the patterns in this book look very complex—which may lead you to believe that they are difficult to knit. In fact, they are not hard at all. They rely mostly on stockinette stitch and ribbing, with the occasional edging in crochet, moss stitch, or garter stitch. The simple stitches free you up to concentrate on the color.

Fair Isle Knitting

Stranding – One-handed

1. On the knit side, drop the working yarn. Bring the new color (now the working yarn) over the top of the dropped yarn and work to the next color change.

2. Drop the working yarn. Bring the new color under the dropped yarn and work to the next color change. Repeat steps 1 and 2.

1. On the purl side, drop the working yarn. Bring the new color (now the working yarn) over the top of the dropped yarn and work to the next color change.

2. Drop the working yarn. Bring the new color under the dropped yarn and work to the next color change. Repeat steps 1 and 2.

Stranding – Two-handed

1. On the knit side, hold the working yarn in your right hand and the non-working yarn in your left hand. Bring the working yarn over the top of the yarn in your left hand and knit with the right hand to the next color change.

1. On the purl side, hold the working yarn in your right hand and the non-working yarn in your left hand. Bring the working yarn over the top of the yarn in your left hand and purl with the right hand to the next color change.

2. The yarn in your right hand is now the non-working yarn; the yarn in your left hand is the working yarn. Bring the working yarn under the non-working yarn and purl with the left hand to the next color change. Repeat steps 1 and 2.

Handling a large number of colors sometimes worries knitters, but it's not as difficult as it seems. The most important thing to do when knitting with lots of colors is to handle the yarns properly. There are two main methods: Fair isle and Intarsia.

Weaving

1. Hold the working yarn in your right hand and the yarn to be woven in your left. To weave the yarn above a knit stitch, bring it over the right needle. Knit the stitch with the working yarn, bringing it under the woven yarn.

2. The woven yarn will go under the next knit stitch. With the working yarn, knit the stitch, bringing the yarn over the woven yarn. Repeat steps 1 and 2 to the next color change.

1. To weave the yarn above a purl stitch, bring it over the right needle. Purl the stitch with the working yarn, bringing it under the woven yarn.

2. To weave the yarn below a purl stitch, purl the stitch with the working yarn, bringing it over the woven yarn. Repeat steps 1 and 2 to the next color change.

Twisting

On the knit side, twist the working yarn and the carried yarn around each other once. Then continue with the same color as before.

On the purl side, twist the yarns around each other as shown, then continue purling with the same color as before.

Intarsia

Intarsia is a colorwork technique in which blocks of color are worked with separate balls of yarn or bobbins. The yarns are not carried across the back of the work between color changes to prevent holes in the work.

Intarsia knitting should not be worked circularly because at the end of the round, the yarns would be in the wrong position. You would have to cut all the yarn and reattach it, leaving you to weave in hundreds of ends.

When changing colors in a vertical line, the yarns must be twisted on every row. When changing colors on a diagonal line, the yarns must only be twisted on every other row. If the diagonal slants to the right, twist the yarns only on knit rows. If the diagonal slants to the left, twist the yarns only on purl rows.

Changing Colors on a Vertical Line

1. On the knit side, drop the old color. Pick up the new color from under the old color and knit to the next color change.

2. On the purl side, drop the old color. Pick up the new color from under the old color and purl to the next color change. Repeat steps 1 and 2.

Changing Colors on a Diagonal Line

2. On the purl side, pick up the new color from under the old color and purl to the next color change.

1. When working a left diagonal on the purl side, bring the new color over the top of the old color and purl to the next color change.

2. On the knit side, pick up the new color from under the old color and knit to the next color change.

1 With the right sides of the pieces facing each other, secure the seam by taking the needle twice around the edges from back to front. Bring the needle up about one-fourth inch (.5cm) from where the yarn last emerged, as shown.

2 In one motion, insert the needle into the point where the yarn emerged from the previous stitch and back up approximately one-fourth inch (.5cm) ahead of the emerging yarn. Pull the yarn through. Repeat this step, keeping the stitches straight and even.

Vertical seam on ribbing

Knit to Knit

When joining ribbing with a knit stitch at each edge, use the bottom loop of the purl stitch on one side and the top loop of the corresponding purl stitch on the other side.

Duplicate Stitch

Duplicate stitch covers a knit stitch. Bring the needle up below the stitch to be worked. Insert the needle under both loops one row above and pull it through. Insert it back into the stitch below and through the center of the next stitch in one motion, as shown.

Acknowledgments

The writing of this book has been an extraordinary journey; through it I've revisited in my mind all the fascinating and inspiring places I've been fortunate enough to have seen. This book wouldn't have been possible without the support and guidance of my traveling partner, friend, and mentor, Kaffe Fassett.

Behind the scenes of this production has been an army of busy hands and minds. Thanks go first to Trisha Malcolm, editorial director of Vogue Knitting, and Erica Smith of Sixth&Spring Books, for believing in me to do this book; Adina Klein for her detailed attention on the styling; and Chi Ling Moy for her gorgeous design. My utmost thanks go to Sharon Brant for her enthusiasm and support in overseeing the technical side of putting together the garments. Sincere thanks to Sharon's mother, Thelma Gardner, for finishing, along with Elaine Cockcroft, Mrs. Oaks, Audrey Barber, Wendy Shipman, and Mary Potter for their tireless hours of knitting. To all the models for making the garments look gorgeous. Thanks to Kate Buller, Colin Chawner, and Stephen Sheard at Rowan Yarns in the United Kingdom, and June and Kenneth Bridgewater in the United States, for supporting and promoting my designs, not to mention the workshop tours supported by Rowan Yarns.

I'd like to acknowledge Richard Womersley for his loyal friendship, trust, and support, Anne James for her mental stimulation, and Candace Bahouth for her loving enthusiasm and passion for creativity.

Sincere appreciation also goes to the countless friends I have made on my journeys who take the time to keep in touch from different corners of the world.

I owe a deep debt of gratitude to my good friend Sheila Rock, a London- and New York-based photographer, for producing the sumptuous images in this book.

My love and deepest appreciation goes to my mother, Yvonne, who is always quietly there for me, and my loving sisters, Eleanor and Belinda Mably. Finally, deepest thanks to my good friend Zoë Lander who has supported me on this book every step of the way.

MAY · 2007

Born in Wales and trained as a chef, Brandon Mably was working as the private cook to the British ambassador in Athens by age 20. A chance encounter with world-renowned designer Kaffe Fassett at a London bus stop led to an abrupt turn into the fashion world—a turn from which Mably has never looked back.

Impressed by Mably's intuitive feel for color, Fassett hired him on the spot. Since then, Mably has gone on to tour the world, giving seminars for the Kaffe Fassett Studio on knitting and the use of color in fashion.

Mably's designs have been featured in Vogue® Knitting, Knitting (UK), and Rowan magazines. When not on tour, he divides his time between his North London flat and a Victorian house on the English coast.
